WRONGFUL DEATH CLAIMS VS.

survival action claims

Generally, there are two types of legal recourse to the painful loss of a loved one due to negligence: filing a wrongful death claim or a survival action claim (or both). A wrongful death claim focuses entirely on the survivors — typically the surviving spouse and/or children, with some states also granting that right to a domestic partner or parents. It is meant to cover the losses of financial support, benefits, love, companionship, comfort, care, and moral support that surviving family members face.

Compensation recovered for wrongful death goes directly to family members. Punitive damages are typically not recoverable for wrongful death claims (with a few exceptions).

A survival action claim is focused on the deceased victim and is usually filed in situations where they are injured by another party's negligence but survive the initial event, only to die later due to their injuries. The longer the time between the initial incident and death, the stronger the claim. During this time, damages suffered by the victim may include having endured substantial pain, suffering, and emotional anguish, and possibly racking up significant medical expenses and lost wages.

Compensation for survival action claims is paid directly to the deceased victim's estate and is distributed upon the estate's settlement. A claim is typically initiated by a personal representative of the estate. Punitive damages are on the table if the victim had survived and been entitled to them.

In many instances, a survival action claim and wrongful death claim are pursued simultaneously to achieve fuller justice.

bias in MOTORCYCLE ACCIDENT CASES

Following accidents, motorcyclists frequently face uphill battles in personal injury cases due to deep-seated biases against them — from accident reports, insurance adjusters, and juries alike.

Many people assume motorcyclists are reckless, aggressive, or inexperienced. Some are swayed by motorcycles' decibel levels. Popular media often portray riders in a negative light: racing through traffic, weaving between cars, lane-splitting, etc. A few cyclists are guilty of this, but not the vast majority.

Some motorists immediately resort to the “I didn’t see them” defense. In fairness, the smaller size of a motorcycle does sometimes present visibility challenges; however, it’s frequently a go-to excuse by auto and truck drivers to deflect from their own negligence and accountability.

Helmet usage can have a disproportionate influence on a case. Even in states where helmets are optional, a motorcyclist not wearing one may be viewed as irresponsible and having contributed to their own injuries, even those apart from the head or neck. This bias often leads to an oversimplification of complex injury causation factors, with motorcyclists frequently being penalized unfairly.

Some adjusters and jury members believe that motorcyclists should have known what they were getting into by riding a motorcycle and therefore bear more of the consequences for incurring serious injuries. This bias diminishes the responsibility of negligent motorists and minimizes a rider’s pain and suffering.

If you or a family member is injured due to the negligence of another driver, contact Corradino & Partners. Our skilled, experienced team will take care of all the details; present your case clearly and accurately; challenge the defendant’s framing of the case when necessary; influence jury selection at trial; and attain significantly higher compensation than those who go it alone. All you need to do is get better and we will take care of the rest. ■

MEDITERRANEAN tuna pasta salad

A delicious and filling lunch, this Mediterranean tuna pasta salad is full of flavor and a healthy lunch idea for any day of the week.

Ingredients

- 1 pound pasta, any short noodle will work (penne, rigatoni, bow ties, etc.)
- 2 jars Tonnino Tuna* (garlic and olive oil flavor, or other of your choice)
- 1/4 cup sun-dried tomatoes
- 4 scallions, green and white parts, diced
- 1/4 cup fresh parsley, stems removed, chopped
- 2 tbsp. capers
- 1/4 cup kalamata olives, sliced
- 1 lemon, zested and juiced
- 1 clove garlic, minced
- 1 tsp. dried oregano
- 1/4 cup olive oil
- salt and pepper to taste

Directions

1. Prepare the pasta according to the instructions on the package; prepare slightly al dente so that it holds up in the pasta salad. Drain and set aside to cool.
2. In a large bowl, combine tuna, sun-dried tomatoes, scallions, parsley, capers, and olives. Mix well.
3. Add drained, cooled pasta to bowl and stir to combine.
4. In a small bowl/jar, whisk together lemon zest, lemon juice, garlic, oregano, and olive oil. Taste and season with salt and pepper as needed.
5. Drizzle dressing over top of pasta salad and toss all together right before serving.

NOTE: If you can't locate Tonnino Tuna, canned tuna will also work in this recipe.
